Learning A Language Differently

This essay was written by Alac Forthood, the Combination Essay for Mrs. Findelton's English class, and Mr. Zanach's Science class, for his graduating piece of work.

Listening to songs in different languages is... peculiar.

You can feel the passion in their voices, the texture of their voices, the tension in the sound waves... yet you know nothing of what they speak of.

It is said that by listening to a language you know no words to, you may pick up the entire thing within a short period of time, just by having an environment full of the words floating into your ears! Could this happen by listening only to a different languages songs? Or would the changed atmosphere cause changes?

And how even to set up such an experiment! How? Everyone learns differently, and if they had already learned the language by sing-hearing, how do they relearn it by speak-hearing? And
